Red henna is added to para-phenylenediamine to form the mixture used to create the temporary black henna tattoo. Allergic reactions resulting in raised bumps such as this is common.

Complications depend substantially on the circumstances in which body modifications are applied, the materials used, and the body region concerned. These mainly result from shortcomings in the application itself (and the rate of healing required) or as a consequence of hygiene regimens. Infections arise as part of the long-realized dualism of the skin microbiome and the balance of different microbial types: transient versus resident
